

co-creating opera

Some results of the Traction Project

Over
8,000
audience
members at live music

11
opera
performances

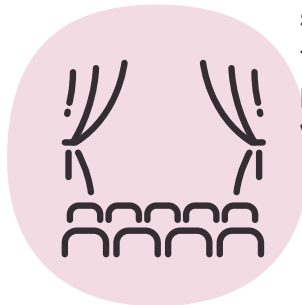

5 hours
of new
contemporary
music composed

3
new co-created operas
performed in an opera house,
a prison, concert halls,
schools, public squares—
and VR headsets. Opera created in: Catalan, Creole, English, Gaelge, Portuguese
and Spanish

Over 20
small concerts,
film screenings and
performances of
work in progress

30
researchers
following
the process

2
new digital tools used during the process and performances with over 20,000 user interactions:
Co-Creation Space
& Co-creation Stage

766,000
people watched opera
co-creation and
performances on TV

1,300
non-professional artists
and community members participating in singing, poster design, construction, music, VR animation, story-telling,
photography printing, costume making
etc. from teenagers to retired people

What the participants thought of the co-creation process

94% felt actively involved

86% felt motivated

89% learned from other people

86% would like to do it again

84% feel more confident

95% said that everyone was respectful of each other

77% thought the project had changed their ideas

75% said that taking part was good for their wellbeing

There was a sense of community while we were doing everything.

I met so many new people and I learnt so many things—it's all new for me but I really love it.

I learned, not to sing, but to give meaning to what I sang.

What audiences thought

93% 'It was well made and performed'

82% 'It was different from anything I've seen before'

80% 'It was about things that really matter to me'

'It was a new thing for me, it was a good experience. We learned new things—that's the most important thing.'

I'd do it again right now. Right now. With the pros and cons. I'd do it again, right away.

'If someone told me I would be singing at the Liceu at 78 years of age, I'd say "You're crazy", but it was very good.'

'I met so many new people and I learnt so many things—it's all new for me but I really love it.'

'It's like going from a darkened room out into the sunlight. It's really great, and I'm more comfortable now working with people.'

'The opera became the good bit we spent in here and that for us was a relief. We're very grateful that it happened that way and gave us the opportunity.'

Traction was a research project to explore how new digital tools could support the co-creation of new operas with communities in Barcelona, Portugal and Ireland. Between 2020 and 2022, artists and researchers worked on co-creation, social inclusion, digital technologies and learning.

This project has received funding from the European Union's Horizon 2020 research and innovation programme under grant agreement No 870610